Supporters of a public health plan say that it would provide public health insurance for every American, regardless of employment status. A public health plan would create universal health care access for people who can't afford private health insurance and don't qualify for Medicaid or Medicare. It would make health care more affordable for patients by empowering Medicare to negotiate lower prices from health care providers and pharmaceutical companies and create more competition in the health care marketplace.

You will now read some statements from opponents of a public health plan, then you'll be asked to answer some follow up questions.

Opponents of a public health plan say that a public health plan will just be another costly government program that will be bad for patients and working families. A public health plan will put politicians and the government in charge of our health care, lead to higher taxes and premiums for hard working Americans, and be a slippery slope to eliminating private health insurance. A public health plan will put a lot of stress on the health care system and underpay health care providers which will negatively impact the quality.

Moving on... you will now read some more statements made by supporters and opponents of a public health plan.

[COST DEFENSE] Supporters of a public health plan say it will save money for patients by empowering Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices, and lower hospital prices. It would also create more marketplace competition causing health care prices and associated premiums to drop. According to independent researchers, a public health plan could save families and employers $154 billion, and save families hundreds of dollars in monthly premiums.

[COST OFFENSE] Opponents of a public health plan say it would be another bloated and expensive government program. Some estimates show that a public health plan could cost American families $700 billion, and the average American worker could see their payroll tax increase by $2,500. American taxpayers can't afford another big government program.

You will now read some more statements made by supporters and opponents of a public health plan

[GOV'T CONTROL DEFENSE] Supporters of a public health plan say that a public health plan would be run by Medicare and give working Americans the same type of coverage that Medicare beneficiaries get. It will also give patients greater decision-making power by providing them with an alternative option on the health care marketplace.

[GOV'T CONTROL OFFENSE] Opponents of a public health plan say that it limits patients' choice and gives government too much control of our health care. A public health plan will be a slippery slope that results in eliminating private insurance and forcing everyone into a one-size fits all government run health care program.
